

Amplifying Youth Through Art: A Social-Emotional Learning and Arts Plan

Introduction

To uplift and empower student voice in schools, while increasing the social and emotional well-being of students, I propose a program called “Amplifying Youth Through Art” (AYTA). AYTA cultivates community within a classroom through arts-based activities and discussions centered around social justice and student experiences. AYTA is dedicated to uplifting student voices for issues they care about utilizing artistic practices. AYTA is rooted in social-emotional learning practices to enhance students’ understanding of self and others. Through its design, AYTA promotes collaboration between students of different backgrounds, disciplines, and experiences.

The Issue

Young people are invested in social justice issues and movements online and in the streets, but they are also overlooked by decision-makers and adults. This can push youth to feel as though their thoughts, opinions, and experiences don’t matter, or that things will never change. This presents an issue when students come of the age to vote. They don’t register or don’t cast their votes because they feel as though they don’t matter in the larger system. Thus, young people have the lowest voter turnout. For example, young people ages 18 to 24 had a 51.4% turnout in the 2020 U.S. Presidential Election compared to the 76.0% turnout from those ages 65 to 74. Colorado’s young people are among the most politically involved with 63% of folks ages 18 to 29 coming out to vote in the 2020 Presidential Election. However, there’s still a lot of work to be done in engaging the voices of young people.

We can tell through social media presence and activity that youth are interested in changing the world around them. This includes fighting climate change, racism, violence, sexual assault, and other systems youth encounter daily. They do care, but they aren’t involved in politics or legislation - two ways they can create impactful change. We can get youth engaged in their communities again by empowering their voices through art!

Philosophy & Approach

Amplifying Youth Through Art engages youth in discussions and artistic forms of expression to get community members to care about the social issues students are invested in. Through AYTA, students will explore the power of their voice and the impact they can have on their communities. Therefore, increasing young people’s sense of activism and promoting involvement in local/state politics through voting or advocacy efforts.

The pilot year of this program concentrates on two art forms: photography and theatre. It involves two school partners including Rangeview High School Yearbook and DSST: Byers Drama Club. The Yearbook students will participate in a photovoice project to capture evocative photos related to issues they care about. They will share their work with the community in the form of an art gallery, virtual photobook, or something else determined by them. The Drama students will use some photos taken in the photovoice portion of the program to begin devising a short play that highlights social issues they are concerned about.

The photovoice portion of this program aims to capture a student’s perspective through still images and short photograph descriptions. However, behind the final product will include several discussions around the topics students are gravitating toward. Some questions to consider throughout this process are: Why are students choosing these issues? Why are these issues important to students? What do these photographs bring up for students? To continue building empathy, we also want to consider how others might experience some of the photography.

The theatre portion is focused on devising, a form of theatre that means making something out of nothing. Devised theatre can center on a social justice issue with the intention to leave the audience and cast feeling like they understand an issue and have action steps to do something about it. Our devising process utilizes work and activities from Theatre of the Oppressed author, Augusto Boal. It is also rooted in forum theatre, an art form that allows audiences to ask questions and engage with theatre in non-conventional ways. We know that the arts promote empathy, but forum theatre puts empathy into practice by encouraging audience participation and integration.

Project Objectives &amp; Evaluation
Objective	Evaluation
Empower youth to realize their voice matters in social movements and their communities.	Comparing the answers to “my voice matters” in the pre/post-program surveys.
Cultivate a community based on trust and respect by integrating social-emotional practices.	Observing how youth react to the integrated SEL activities from class and from devised theatre practices.  Analyzing how young people respond to “my peers care about what I have to say” and “I care about what my peers have to say”.
With input from youth, create and share a final project with the public to spark conversations.	Observing how youth engage with one another when collaborating on their final sharing.
Social-Emotional Learning Goals &amp; Evaluation
Objective	Evaluation
Students feel a sense of belonging at their school.	Comparing the answers to “I belong in my school community” in the pre/post-program surveys.
Students explore their own feelings and emotions around social issues.	Observing how students engage with each other during discussions about their photographs and writing prompts.

Educators, administrators, and adults promote relationships with students by attending final sharings and performances.	Offering adults a short questionnaire to see how they responded to youth's artistic expression. Will consult with students to see what questions they are most curious about.

Student Surveys

There will be a pre-program and post-program survey for students to fill out anonymously, they will consist of the same questions to track student growth if any. The surveys serve to indicate how students feel about their school and local communities and their place within those systems. Ultimately, we are wanting to know if students felt seen, heard, and important to their communities. Through observation and discussion, we'll discover how students respond to the artistic outlet in conjunction with activism and social change movements, this does not need to be captured in a survey format.

Timeline & Methods

Amplifying Youth Through Arts is a fluid and flexible program that can implement a multitude of different art forms. This first project is 10 weeks long, 6 weeks are dedicated to the photovoice portion and 4 weeks are set for the devised theatre portion. The photovoice portion meets twice a week for 58 minutes each session. The theatre portion meets three times a week for 90 minutes each session. AYTA should be implemented and encouraged for as long as a school community finds it beneficial. The table below captures our timeline as well as our objectives and activities for each session.
